Bufferin® relieves pain twice as fast!

Di-Alminate makes the difference

Medical science knows that a pain reliever must get into the blood stream to relieve pain.

Bufferin combines aspirin with an exclusive combination of two antacid ingredients called Di-Alminate. These speed the pain reliever into the blood stream twice as fast. So...

Bufferin relieves pain twice as fast. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

1. All leading pain remedies, including other compounds, rely on aspirin! But...
2. Aspirin without antacid is relatively slow-acting. It is acid and can irritate your stomach.
3. Only Bufferin adds to aspirin an exclusive combination of antacids called Di-Alminate. So Bufferin relieves pain twice as fast as aspirin—won't upset your stomach!

Protect their precious future now

Like most young fathers, as soon as your children were born, you probably began to think more seriously about your family's future. You began to plan how you could make sure that they will have a secure home and an education, even if something should happen to you.

The time when children are young, however, is usually the time when the family income is far from ample . . . and the cost of the usual permanent insurance may look quite large. That is why Metropolitan has developed a special life insurance policy called the RPG-5.

This simply means that reduced premiums are guaranteed for the first five years. When the five years are up the premiums will increase to the level where they will remain for the life of the policy . . . but this increase may be offset by future dividends.

So here is an opportunity to get the full, permanent form of protection that your family needs . . . at a lower initial premium rate which may better fit your budget.

This is a perfect policy for the family man whose income hasn't quite caught up with his talents. It has all the cash and loan values that make permanent insurance such a wise investment.

Call your Metropolitan Representative today and ask him about the RPG-5. He will welcome the chance to explain this valuable policy . . . and to show that

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CRISIS IN EDUCATION

Sirs:

As a parent and a teacher I have but one word for your new series on education—HOORAY ("Crisis in Education," LIFE, March 24).

The handwriting is on the wall but, unfortunately, we're rearing a generation that can't read.

DOROTHY S. BROWN
West Carrollton, Ohio

Sirs:

You deserve a wreath of laurel for your revealing presentation of "parallel lives" in Moscow's and Chicago's high schools. Every criticism of American spoon-fed education is a step in the right direction.

I especially appreciate one subtle touch: Alexei has read Dreiser's Sister Carrie. Would our Chicago student, just now reading Stevenson, even know of this author or his book, which has his own city as its setting?

ROBERT H. WOODWARD
Assistant Professor of English
San Jose State College
San Jose, Calif.

Sirs:

No other great nation in history ever has educated so many so well. American educators, school boards, parents and other interested citizens must continue to seek better ways to develop more powerful schools for all children. In the meantime let us not succumb to the Sputnik-inspired hysteria which might lead us to believe that there is a Communist educational miracle in every Red schoolhouse.

J. HARRY ADAMS
Superintendent of Schools
Elizabeth, N.J.

Sirs:

LIFE is to be applauded. The comparison of the education received by the two boys described in the article, their attitudes and behavior, is enough to make one laugh if it didn't hurt so much.

MORTIMER H. SLOTNICK
Acting Assistant Principal
Albert Leonard Junior High School
New Rochelle, N.Y.

Sirs:

The Russian boy was above-average student in a school consisting of only 33 1/3% of the children who started school in his class.

The Chicago youth was "an average student" academically in an institution retaining 100% of the school population.

Under such circumstances, how can you compare the two cases, except to defend a preconceived prejudice?

LESLIE J. MAUTH
Associate Professor of Education
Ball State Teachers College
Muncie, Ind.

Sirs:

"Crisis in Education" defames the character of the American student and the name of the secondary school involved.

The student body of Austin High is in a big uproar over the situation, and the teachers are not too happy about it either.

MARLENE ROSENBERG
Austin High School
Chicago, Ill.

Sirs:

I think the Russians show more educational wisdom than we do. Education is proper concentration with some recreation. We fear smarter people than ourselves and why not? We educate the stupid pupils into enjoyments of life which they demand later on as a God-given right.

As a substitute teacher I see so many young girls of little intelligence combining their hair and reading movie magazines in class. They sit day after day not cooperating in any way—demanding the time of the teacher and still no one sorts them into a class on their own level. The intelligent pupils are lost in the shuffle.

I really wonder what it would be like to teach a class of Russian children? I judge it would be a really deeply moving experience.

HILDA H. WHITE
Hazleton, Pa.

Sirs:

The goal of the United States should be to cultivate a truly indigenous American educational system, not one patterned after the Russian system which seems to be dedicated to creating class barriers, albeit they are based on intellectual criteria rather than economic distinction. Our manners may need a little polishing and our ability to answer a questionnaire deficient, but our goals are worth striving for.

MARGARET K. RHEIN
Cranford, N.J.

Sirs:

As a former high school teacher who could not accept the type of thing you exposed, I wish to commend you. It would have been a truer picture if you had shown a half-dozen pupils reading Modern Romance.

MILDRED JENSEN
Chicago, Ill.

Sirs:

Count the smiles of the Russians and those of the Americans. Surely this must be worth something.

NANCY C. BERTSLER
Springfield, N.J.

Sirs:

As long as Steve has a chick like Penny and Alexei has homework, I figure that Steve is the winner.

KEITH EKBLAW
Rock Island, Ill.

Sirs:

Stephen, in referring to his grades, has remarked, "I worry about 'em, but that's about as far as it goes." My students don't worry—period!

MRS. C. J. CARSKADDAN
West New York, N.J.

Sirs:

I am pleased that LIFE, in its current special series of articles, is calling attention to the problems and promise of American education. The opening instalment was very interesting.

May I point out one slight discrepancy? I was quoted as demanding "less chrome, less country-clubbing." It appears I was referring to "country-clubbing" within our schools.

I had a different point in mind. The quotation, from a talk in Chicago on Nov. 2, was: "... It is conceivable that we may have to get along with a little less chrome and perhaps a few less country clubs in order to have more classrooms and more and better paid teachers."

M. B. FOLSOM
Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare
Washington, D.C.

Sirs:

The following quotations are in order, it seems to me, as commentary on Sloan Wilson's article, "It's Time to Close Our Carnival."

"A truly ignorant man can easily work himself up into a feverish fury about the public schools, and in a brief article or book can unburden himself of enough righteous indignation to heat a summer hotel in January."

"The schools have never been anywhere near as good as they are today."

"The idea that we once had marvelous public schools in this nation, and that modern philosophies of education have ruined them, is the most obvious kind of nonsense."

If your readers wish to read the entire article from which the above excerpts are taken—and I wholeheartedly recommend it—it appeared in Harper's (September, 1955), "Public Schools Are Better Than You Think." The author of the article? Mr. Sloan Wilson.

VIRGIL M. ROGERS
Dean

School of Education
Syracuse University
Syracuse, N.Y.

● Wilson's Harper's article was a plea for public support of the schools. The sentence quoted above, "The schools have never been anywhere near as good as they are today . . ." went on to say ". . . but the gap between what they are and what the people want is greater than ever before." The sentence beginning "The idea . . ." was followed by "as a matter of fact, no nation through all history has ever had good public schools for all its people, or seriously tried to." In this article Wilson went on to deplore the wide assortment of "frill" courses, the devaluation of the high school diploma.—ED.

Sirs:

After wading through the millions of words of misinformation, exaggeration and oversimplification on American education which admirals, alleged scholars and other self-appointed experts have so generously contributed in lieu of careful study and calm deliberation, you have rendered an immense service in presenting Sloan Wilson's brilliant, rational and concise analysis.

MAURITZ JOHNSON JR.
Professor of Education
State University of New York
Albany, N.Y.

A LIFETIME THROWN AWAY

Sirs:

May I congratulate Robert Wallace on the most moving article I've read in a magazine in years ("A Lifetime Thrown Away by a Mistake 59 Years Ago," LIFE, March 24). It is also a triumph of taste and sensibility, the story of Mayo Buckner, and of indignation that is all the more effective because it is restrained. Sherwood Anderson could hardly have told it better.

DWIGHT MACDONALD
New York, N.Y.

Sirs:

It is one of the finest pieces of writing ever to appear in LIFE.

ERWIN W. SMITH
New York, N.Y.

Sirs:

The state of Iowa owes Mayo Buckner 50 years of back pay.

ELSIE A. KOEPKE
Long Beach, Calif.

Sirs:

I'm still shuddering over man's inhumanity to man.

My husband, a music store owner, will be only too happy to send Mayo Buckner a new clarinet outfit, small recompense for a misspent life.

M. ALICE STERNBERG
Newton Highlands, Mass.

EDITORIAL

Sirs:

Your editorial adds up to an outstanding condensation of our collective mess ("The Recession in Politics," LIFE, March 24). What really gets me is why so many of us want old Sam to bail us out of our dollar troubles. A lifelong Republican, I want a leader, immune and numbed to nonsensical criticism, to say to America, "I will not give my blessing to or authorize any ideal scheme or proposal to buy any personal or professional happiness."

RICHARD A. MELROSE
Balboa, Calif.

Sirs:

Your editorial does not offer much hope for the future in view of the past five years of Republican leadership in Washington.

You speak of the remarkable "bullish" outlook of 165 large corporation executives, yet it was the overanticipation of the strength of the consumer market that has resulted in over-production, high inventories of goods that will not move at constantly higher pricing policies which brought on the present stagnation and cutback in employment.

D. M. LAUGHLIN
Bloomington, Ill.

PRESTIDIGITATING PREACHER

Sirs:

The Rev. Mr. Owens is causing his church to descend into the purgatories of superstition ("A Prestidigitating Preacher," LIFE, March 24). This is one Presbyterian who disapproves of his Sunday morning carnival.

ROBERT A. FERGUSON
Catonsville, Md.

Sirs:

LIFE's story on the preacher brings to mind a young Yeshiva University rabbinical student who tells "the greatest story ever told" with the use of some remarkable feats of magic.

Jack Glickman, 25, a full-fledged member of the Magicians' Guild—and a professional magician—puts his artistry to use in a unique presentation of the Old Testament. Embellished with original poetic narration, Glickman's performance includes dramatizations of such popular Biblical incidents as "the rod of the Lord changing into a serpent," and a host of others.

SAM HARTSTEIN
New York, N.Y.

YESHIVA CONJURER

SEEABLE SONG

Sirs:

Kudos to your N.R. Farbman for his excellent "The Seeable Songs of 'South Pacific,'" (LIFE, March 24).

It's a pity that the same imagination with a color camera could not have been shown by the makers of the film itself.

SPEAKING OF PICTURES

Soccer Spoof from Russia

In a far-fetched way, the performers were all putting on quite an exhibition of serious soccer. The goalie made an incredible leap to knock down the ball. The referee gave his all to quell the riot. A player squirmed on his belly to reach the ball while a photographer crawled under an avalanche of feet to take his picture, and the rest of the players, ignoring the ball, hurled themselves into the air.

These acrobatics were being executed with perfect rhythm to the music of an orchestra on the stage of the Peter Tchaikovsky Theatre in Moscow. The players were performers of the Moiseyev Dance Company, a renowned Russian folk ballet group which, with gusto and grace, has turned the breath-taking leaps of Tartar and Cossack dances into the soaring satire on Russia's modern craze for soccer. Soon to open at New York's Metropolitan Opera House as the start of a tour of nine U.S. cities, the dancers performed to give Americans a preview of their lively antics.

LEAPING GOALIE shoots up in front of the soccer ball kicked by player in foreground and knocks it away, performing the whole maneuver in time to the music.

MAKING A SAVE, PLAYER GRABS BALL UNDER FEET OF OPPOSING TEAM WHILE PHOTOGRAPHER GETS TRAMPLED TRYING TO SHOOT PICTURE OF HIM THROUGH

FLYING REFEREE soars into the soccer game to stop a free-for-all fight between the two teams. The player flipping upside down past him is being ejected from the game by his angry opponents. All dancers exaggerate positions real soccer players get into during games while trying to butt the ball with their heads.

A HAPPY PASSEL OF KANKAKEE BUSINESSMEN RIDES "MR. GLOOM" (ACTUALLY JOHN JOHNSON, A DEPARTMENT STORE WORKER) ON A RAIL TO MOCK HANGING

INTO THE BREACH: AMERICAN INGENUITY, EXUBERANCE AND HUMOR

THE HARD SELL vs. HARD TIMES

With a convincing show of high spirits, businessmen in Kankakee, Ill. last week rode on a rail and laid to rest "Mr. Gloom," symbol of the recession. It was a uniquely American display of purposeful play and was typical of the exuberant energy with which a good many other U.S. merchants were fighting their problems. Like similar antics elsewhere, the Kankakee carryings-on were aimed directly—and quite properly—at penny-pinching pessimism.

Whether psychology can lick the downturn or not, the fact was that the money is there—as it had not been in '29. The big problem was to get people to spend it. Despite 5.4 million workers unemployed and industrial output off 11%, personal savings stood at $20.2 billion—$200 million more than a year ago. To get at this treasure and get the economy into a higher gear the merchants, who for years had had virtually no trouble selling anything at any price, were learning again how to sell long, loud and hard. And if the uses of adversity were not sweet, the reactions were exciting.

Merchants used gags, stunts, contests, and giveaways. The hardest of the hard selling was being done by the auto industry, the hardest hit. Car dealers, up to their ears in promotions, are phoning through the directories number by number and even dashing into the street to collar passing motorists.

But beyond all the gimmicks and giveaways, the hard sell's clincher was bargains. And bargains were showing up again. One major mail order firm's summer catalogue showed price reductions that average 13% and the competitors would have to follow suit. If this was not a cure-all, the hard-sell boys made clear that there was no better single tonic for the economy than relentless advertising and muscular merchandising of attractive goods at attractive prices.

RECESSION, SURE, BUT WITH IRONIC ASPECTS

Between relief and champagne, we sometimes wonder whether we are in trouble or clover

Last week LIFE correspondents throughout the U.S. reported on who is and is not being hurt by the recession and how much. Here are the answers, assembled by Staff Writer Herbert Brean.

TO millions of Americans—unemployed, on relief, worried about losing their jobs—the 1958 recession is a grim, inescapable reality. But this recession also has its high-living aspects, and the problems are not all serious. An unemployed New Yorker used one relief check to buy stock from his broker. In Memphis a worker who lost his job complained that his unemployment relief checks were coming in too fast. He asked the state commission to slow them up. In Buffalo two kinds of cars were selling well—small, economy European models and Cadillacs. In Portland, Ore., department stores are unhappy because their charge account business is off. People are forcing cash on them.

In Jacksonville, Fla. merchants have discovered a bus strike does not hurt business but helps it. Because of the transportation problem, housewives stay downtown longer and buy more things. Similarly, their husbands, unable to get to work by bus, buy cars. In Oklahoma City so many unemployed people are driving to the Capitol Hill area to pick up their relief checks that their cars clog the parking lots and discourage shoppers. In Los Angeles a busybody examined the parking lot of the state unemployment insurance office. Of the 50-odd cars in the lot, seven were 1958 Cadillacs.

Throughout the U.S., expensive travel reservations are holding up well and the annual New York Toy Fair, which to some extent indicates the amount of next winter's Christmas spending, this year broke all records with over $1 billion worth of orders. On both coasts the motorboat and yacht business is enjoying the best year in its history. Fuller Brush men are finding more people at home and are prospering accordingly. Even a small New York mail order house, which specializes in unessential knickknacks such as bejeweled fly swatters and "personalized" neckties, reports the best year in its 12-year history.

A swank California restaurant had nothing more worrisome to report than a growing customer resistance to wines costing more than $10 a bottle, and a tendency among champagne lovers to order the $14 variety instead of the $18. San Francisco's Blue Fox restaurant reports business in its special cellar room (dinners $20 to $30) is up 50%. A Dallas businessman takes a wry view: "The trouble is, people are trying to live within their incomes. It's ruining the national economy."

The merchants are doing their part to promote business and make it easy for people to buy. Nickel coffee is back in Los Angeles, roll-your-own cigaret machines have reappeared in Denver. The two-pants suit has turned up once more; in Louisville it is accompanied by a free pair of shoes. A Philadelphia movie house offers three features for 20¢-13¢ for children. A Seattle private eye is willing to work on a 24-months-to-pay basis.

A Boston retailer makes a telling observation about recession salesmanship: "People have to be tempted. For instance, there's nothing new in women's slips, so women buy slips only as needed. But the shortie nightgown and the sack nightie are new. Those items sell."

A Buffalo burlesque proprietor, thinking he had the answer to rising costs, recently replaced live girls with sexy movies and reduced his prices. Business dipped. When he switched back to the more expensive shows with live girls, he found that his customers were willing to pay the difference.

Torn between such varied impulses, some Americans behaved strangely. Refused further credit at the meat counter, a Cleveland resident grabbed the butcher and locked him in his own meat cooler. When he returned next day for more meat, the butcher shot him in the leg. The chain letter, a familiar craze of the 1930s, is back—but with a difference. A Los Angeles version requires that the person entering the chain pay not with dimes or even dollars but by buying two $25 defense bonds for the names at the head of the list. In Delray Beach, Fla. a joiner has to buy four $25 bonds and in Denver it costs two $50 bonds to get in the game. (Florida banks did a thriving business until the authorities cracked down.) An Oregon specialty shop owner, commenting on the national reluctance to buy staples in large quantities, says, "I used to buy my liquor by the case. Now I only buy three bottles at a time. Of course," he adds, "I drink just as much."

In many cities young men are enlisting in the Army, Navy and local police departments—all "secure" lines of work in times of economic distress. An even younger man sought security in a different way. Ten-year-old Jimmy Gallagher of Lorain, Ohio, son of a U.S. Steel employee, ran away from home after taking a little money to finance what he regarded as a sensible trip. "There'd been a lot of talk at home about my father maybe losing his job," said Jimmy later. "I got worried. After all, I didn't want to be a burden to my family." He explained this to a newspaper reporter in Cleveland where he was found with what was left of his $6. This was in a plush hotel where, fleeing the recession, Jimmy had tried to check in.

In this recession it is hard to tell where to look for a sure portent. Even the pawnshop business, usually an infallible economic sign, points in several directions. "Times must be better," says a Memphis pawnbroker. "People are bringing in only junk." But a Denver broker sees a storm signal: "It's newer stuff that's being hocked. A bad sign." Los Angeles pawnbrokers don't like the looks of things, either. "It's all hocking and no redeeming," says one. "Even decent people are hocking their wedding rings." Says another, "People are trying to pawn everything, even the clothes off their backs. One guy takes his hearing aid off his ear and hocks it with me. Since then I've turned down three or four others. I find there's no market for hearing aids." In Kansas City police are not ticketing cars parked in front of a leading pawnshop. "They got hearts," explains the proprietor. "They're not going to slap a $5 ticket on a guy who's trying to get a measly three bucks."

The pawnshop trade is adapting itself to all kinds of business. A Kansas City laborer down on his luck pawned his false teeth to finance a job hunt, then lived on soft foods for two months until he regained a job and could regain his teeth. But perhaps the best example of ingenuity in overcoming recession adversity has been furnished by a jobless Cleveland steelworker who, facing eviction from his home for nonpayment of rent and knowing his unemployment check was due any moment, brought his wife into a pawnshop. "How much?" he asked. After listening to the explanation, the pawnbroker said, "I'll give $25." The steelworker took the money, left his wife in hock, paid the rent, returned in three hours with his check and redeemed his loyal mate.

ATTACKING BATISTA. Cuban rebel leader Fidel Castro in mountain headquarters declares, "There Batista crushes the strike, the revolution will not be lost. Then we will see what happens in six months."

CASTRO ON EVE

Cuban rebel discusses general

These pictures provide the best look yet at Cuban rebel leader Fidel Castro in his hideout in the Sierra Maestra country of eastern Cuba. They were taken by Photographer Andrew St. George on the eve of Castro's most ambitious bid in his 16-month guerrilla war against Dictator Fulgencio Batista. Castro was preparing to proclaim a general strike and "total war" throughout the island. Batista in turn reinforced his army and gave workers the right to shoot strike agitators.

Soft-spoken but confident of eventual rebel victory, Castro disclaimed—in an interview with TIME Correspondent Sam Halper—any ambitions to step into Batista's shoes. This was at variance with the impression an earlier Castro pronouncement had made on some of his Cuban backers, who had begun to fear him as another dictator. In any event, protracted rebellion was beginning to take on aspects of a personal vendetta. Batista wanted to quit but insisted on saving face in the process. Castro was determined that Batista should go in disgrace. Meanwhile Cuba and her people were caught in the middle of the enmity between the waning dictator and the unbending rebel.

TALKING OF U.S., Castro says "U.S. investors will have nothing to fear" from him. He retracted his 1953 demand for nationalization of U.S. plants in Cuba, saying "At that time I had more radical ideas."

TALKING OF FUTURE, Castro declares, "I have never thought of being president of Cuba. After we win, I am going to live in the Sierra Maestra, building roads and hospitals which we have promised."

GROMYKO'S SHELL GAME

Andrei Gromyko called it a "noble initiative" . . . President Eisenhower called it "a gimmick . . . a side issue." Everybody agreed that the Soviet Union's announced suspension of nuclear testing was smart propaganda, well designed to deepen an existing split in free world opinion. How deep it went is open to question, but even in the U.S., Gromyko's speech has sown some doubt.

Secretary Dulles is under attack for his meek acceptance of "this propaganda thrust." Though well warned in advance, he and President Eisenhower deliberately decided on a stance of stony virtue, largely influenced by the AEC and Pentagon, with no attempt at counterthrust beyond Dulles' able but defensive press conference last week. This was an inadequate retort to Gromyko's fakery and did scant justice to our own nuclear policy.

Gromyko's most obvious fakery was his timing. His gesture comes at the end of a series of Soviet nuclear tests. It will take them about a year or so to absorb the findings and set up their next tests, then blaming the resumption on our failure to follow their lead. The U.S., by contrast, is on the eve of a new test series to which foreign (including Soviet) observers have been invited.

Instead of merely pointing this out, the State Department could have added a sting or two to its reply. As Senator Humphrey urges, we could have revealed all we know about the Soviet tests, which is more than the Soviets have revealed. For this, someone would have to persuade the AEC's Lewis Strauss that political warfare is just as important as his kind of secrecy, which hoards facts the Soviets already know.

As for our own 1958 tests, we are quite right not to forego them. They are important not only to our defense but also, as Dulles said, "perhaps to humanity." For they will bring us closer to the so-called "clean" bomb—one with practically no radioactive fallout at all.

An H-bomb without fallout is still an outrageous weapon of destruction. But it will have at least two advantages over the "dirty" bombs that have been snowing their tiny increments of hazard over the world. First, clean bombs would not poison remote bystanders in case of war (including American bystanders under a nuclear anti-missile missile). Second, they would eliminate a confusing and diversionary element from the whole nuclear policy debate: the element of doubt, skillfully exploited in Gromyko's speech, as to how dangerous the fallout from testing really is.

This doubt, even though AEC figures show the danger to be negligible, is a sapping distraction from the main issue. The danger to the world is not present fallout but mounting stockpiles of nuclear weapons. The serious question before the world is not whether to test but how to control these weapons, clean or dirty, old or new.

On that subject, Gromyko's lies can be checked by the respective positions of the Soviets and the West on nuclear disarmament, which are on record for all members of the U.N. Ever since the Baruch Plan, the U.S. has been trying to eliminate nuclear weapons from the world's arsenals by international agreement in the belief that they are too dangerous not to be internationally controlled. We announced this proposition when we had a monopoly of atomic weapons. We have continued to maintain it throughout the period in which Communist aggression has imposed an unwelcome policy of nuclear deterrence on the West.

Up through last August we had made, through U.N. and "summit" channels, at least three major proposals for the international control of nuclear stock piles, production and materials, and for the international inspection of nuclear facilities. The Soviets have either rejected or evaded all these proposals. Since January they have been boycotting the U.N. Disarmament Commission entirely. While agreeing in principle that only mutual inspection will keep the international controls honest, they have refused to discuss its serious application.

Thus the very first seed of the international confidence which is indispensable to weapons control has not even been planted. Gromyko, though he aimed last week's maneuver at the world's confidence, deserves about as much of it as a man with three shells and a pea. Inviting attention to the false issue of testing, he induces the world's neglect of the most serious threat it has ever faced.

Our nuclear disarmament policy has been profoundly right. It has never lacked a large U.N. majority. It has lacked the kind of articulation that would make its rightness a political weapon. But it should never lack full American support.

CONGRESS, SPARE OUR CAPITOL

Congressmen are professionally devoted to efficiency, economy and preserving the nation's heritage. They have a last chance, this session, to undo a serious violation of all three principles, and one literally in their own front yard, by taking a hard second look at their own legislation for repairing the East Front of the Capitol.

In complete defiance of public and professional opinion, a special congressional commission dominated by Speaker Rayburn has adopted a wasteful plan for pushing the facade of the Capitol 32½ feet in front of the present one. The cost of this extension is officially estimated at $135 a square foot but responsible architects fear it would exceed $300. This makes it about the most expensive job of structural plastic surgery since Cheops changed his plans on the Great Pyramid. The principal excuse given is Congress' need for extra office and dining space.

The American Institute of Architects has argued itself blue in the face trying to explain to Congress that extra space in the Capitol can be supplied more amply, more artistically and far more cheaply by remodeling the West Front. An extension of the East Front would not only be inefficient. It would spoil the present pillared facade just below the dome which is architecturally distinctive and a visible national monument. Presidents since 1817 have sworn their inaugural oaths beneath its graceful Federal columns.

No argument, however, has bothered Sam Rayburn, who never had it so powerful, or his friend, ex-Congressman J. George Stewart, the fast-talking Architect of the Capitol (who himself is a contractor, not an architect). Rayburn's commission has even kept its Architect's plans a secret. Rayburn has allowed no public hearing in the House, and bills to rectify his action, notably one proposed by Representative Reuss (D., Wis.), have been skillfully held up in committee.

The Senate's Public Works Committee has unanimously approved a bill proposed by Senator Alexander Smith (R., N.J.), that is similar to the Reuss bill. Since Sam won't let the House act, we appeal to Lyndon Johnson to let the Smith bill come to a vote. The needed East Front repairs can be done for about $3 million—not much to pay for one of our last visible contacts with the American tradition, far less than the $10 to $25 million the taxpayers will have to pay to satisfy Speaker Sam's unrepresentative choice.

REBEL-BOUND IN A BOAT over Lake Toba, Dominis heads for Balige in one of his four trips there. For-hire boat was hidden under some trees near Prapat.

BLOCKED IN A BUS, Dominis was stopped by too-low crosspiece over emergency bridge on his road to war. Bridge was rebuilt so that bus here gets through.

HIGH STEPPING REVOLUTIONARY RECRUITS, SOME OUT OF STEP, ARE PHOTOGRAPHED BY DOMINIS IN REBEL AREA AS THEY GET A LITTLE MAKESHIFT TRAINING

A REPORT ON A VISIT TO A SMALL WAR

Chasing the Indonesian revolt, a photographer crosses lines five times but finds nobody bloodthirsty

The revolt of central Sumatra against President Sukarno's Indonesian government has been going on for two months. Since actual hostilities began last March 10 several towns have changed hands—some of them more than once—but no decisive battle has yet been fought. To appraise the character and meaning of this conflict, LIFE Photographer John Dominis spent a fortnight in Sumatra shuttling from the government to the rebels and back again. Here, written and photographed by Dominis, is a revealing report on the world's strangest and still most civil civil war.

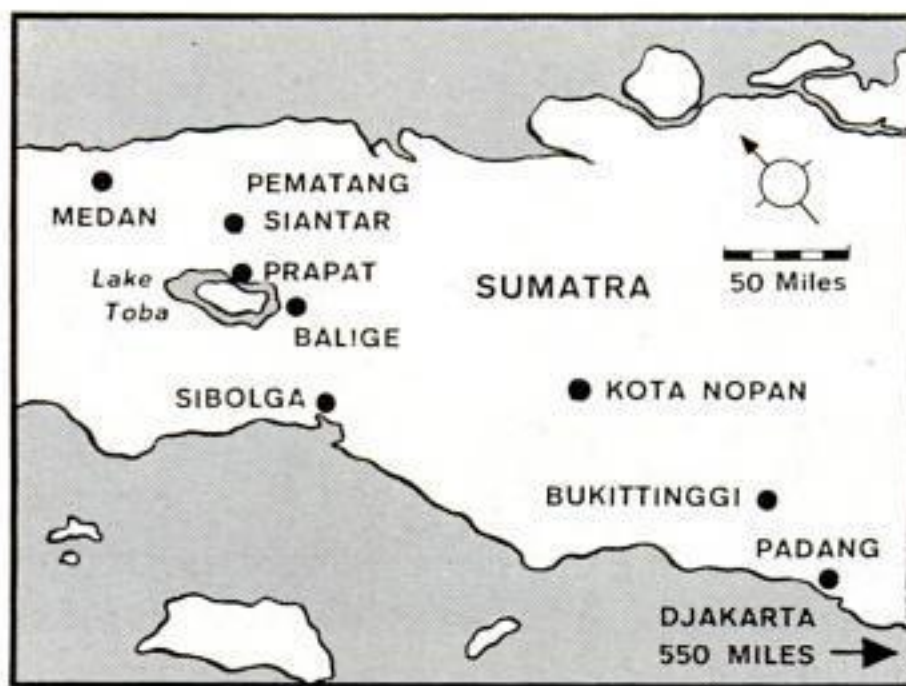

MY coverage of the Indonesian revolt in Sumatra was like two weeks bouncing in a Bendix washing machine. I crossed the line between government and rebels five times and never heard a shot fired in anger.

Neither side is eager for fighting and both play it like a chess game. When one side is stronger in a situation the other retreats. The Sumatrans are a charming and friendly people, too gentle for the business of revolt. There is no hatred here and, more important, there is no addiction to an ideal to make a great war.

My search for the war began in Medan which was held by the government. I hired a taxi and started for rebel Padang, equipped with haversack, camera bag, pillow, two bottles of Chianti and several cans of cheese. The taxi took me to Prapat and then, over 40 miles with 1,400 turns, went on to Sibolga. There I hired a jeep with a fearless driver. When the wire to his overhead light started shorting, he bit the wire in half while sparks shot out around his teeth.

Next day I caught the King Kong Express bus to Kota Nopan. We came to where a bridge had washed out and had been fixed with logs and bamboo poles. The passengers got down and the bus tried to cross. But it was stopped by a crosspiece over the bridge (preceding page). We waited while men rebuilt the thing. Three hours later we were on the way.

At another washout everything stopped. I had to walk two miles to other buses waiting to go on to the rebel capital, Bukittinggi.

There I learned that a war had started up about 400 miles behind at Medan where government troops had revolted. I started back. Fuel was short in Bukittinggi, but an army major gave me 30 liters of gasoline and a liter of kerosene, which you need for the hotel to cook your meals. I hired a whole bus by buying all the seats. It had an eight-toned horn. The bus company said I could keep the money if we picked up any customers.

Before we left a Colonel Djambek gave me a letter saying I could visit the rebel front.

During the day I sold a few seats and then lay down to sleep while the driver went on. Next morning I woke up to find the bus full of people, chickens and a dog. I could not get more than a few hundred rupiahs out of them. The bus quit at Balige because there was a rumor of fighting 40 miles north.

I rented a bus about the size of a pickup to return to Prapat. The bus had one sign saying "picnic" and another wartawan, which is "press." They weren't taking any chances.

Prapat was full of soldiers. This, I said to myself, is the rebel front, and I happily showed my letter to the guard. He read it carefully, but said, "But we are Central Government soldiers." So I started smiling and shouting at him, "Bagoose, bagoose! Bole!" which means, "Good, good! Okay!" This seemed to satisfy the commander for he let me go.

I wasn't finding any fighting yet. The only real battle I knew of was near Pematang Siantar on March 18 when a lieutenant and 18 rebels were killed. These kids did not know which end of a rifle the bullets came out of. I asked one government captain what he would do if a superior said to switch sides. He said, "I am a soldier. If they give me a uniform and a paycheck I will do what the commander orders."

Still in government Prapat the next day, I hired a motorboat and in three hours I was back with the rebels in the town of Balige. Next day I visited Prapat and saw government forces, then went back to Balige. There I met a rebel major who said he would help me find the war but first we had to go back 150 miles to get permission from rebel Colonel Simbolon.

Simbolon refused to see me but told the major it was okay to show me the war. Back we went to Balige, and when we saw a patrol fitted out to fight we followed. We started hiking at nightfall and came to a beautiful village with huge thatched houses. The villagers gave us rice and goose eggs. In this war the natives cooperate with whichever side controls an area.

The rebels say that this revolt represents a dedication against Communism, but I have not seen any dedication on either side. Well, the next day we began marching farther into the mountains but then the captain told me this was as far as I could go. This was the end. So I took a boat back to Prapat and the government side. Back in Medan I tried to persuade the government army to take me along, but they refused.

This isn't much of a war, of course, and it is even harder to try to analyze. I can see no satisfaction and no reasonable outcome. Of course President Sukarno has been a poor administrator, wishy-washy on Communism and has not given a just share of the wealth to Sumatra. I know it is popular to be pro-rebel but the rebels have nothing to offer the people either. I think the rebels counted on the government's never being able to afford to send troops from Djakarta to Sumatra. Now they hope for trouble in Java so the government forces will have to leave.

Meanwhile the government will force the rebels into the hills and when things get rough I think the rebels will put their sarongs back on. Of course, there is a possibility if they are forced and there is no way of saving face, the rebels' leaders and their diehard troops might put up one hell of a battle. I don't like to get shot at, but I am disappointed that I could not find this war. If anyone invents a more difficult place to work it will probably still be somewhere in Indonesia.

EARLY PUBLICITY PICTURE HELPED PROMOTE LANA TURNER AS HOLLYWOOD'S SWEATER GIRL AS SHE WAS CALLED AFTER HER FIRST MINOR ROLE IN 1937 MOVIE

SWEATER GIRL LANA'S BUILD-UP TO A TRAGEDY

Turner saga of stardom, blighted by broken romances, comes to climax with slaying by her daughter

The unhappily familiar Hollywood paradox of financial success and personal misfortune attained superwide-screen dimensions in the career of Lana Turner. Discovered 22 years ago at a Sunset Boulevard soda fountain, she was used in sweater-girl promotions like the one above to parlay a series of movies into big box office. When she outgrew glamour roles she used her wealth to form her own producing company and developed so well as an actress that she was nominated for an Academy Award this year. But her private life produced a tangle of broken romances and finally degenerated into an association with a personable hoodlum.

Last Friday night Lana was involved in a tragic episode of violence. A quarrel broke out between Lana and her boyfriend, Johnny Stompanato, in the star's newly rented Beverly Hills home. Lana's daughter, Cheryl Crane, an unhappy 14-year-old who once ran away trying to avoid school, said she overheard Stompanato say: "I'll get you if it takes a day, a week or a year. I'll cut you up . . . and if I can't do it myself I'll find someone who can." Cheryl got a butcher knife, walked into the all-pink bedroom and with one lunge fatally stabbed Stompanato in the stomach. She told police, "I did it to protect mother. I thought he was going to get her."

Stompanato was once associated with gangster Bugsy Siegel and had a reputation for letting pretty women spend their money freely on him. Said his underworld pal Mickey Cohen, "This was a great guy. He traveled with the best. I mean he dated plenty of Hollywood stars." The tragedy raised old questions in Hollywood about Lana's ill-fated selection of men. Only recently she and Johnny spent a vacation together in Acapulco, and before quarrels violently punctured the romance Lana sent Johnny a Spanish-inscribed bracelet found on his body: "My sweet Love, remember a piece of my heart will be with you always.—Lanita."

FIRST HUSBAND was Artie Shaw. They married in 1940, when she was 19. The marriage lasted five months.

SECOND HUSBAND was Cheryl's father Stephen Crane. They wed in 1942, again in 1943 after annulment.

THIRD HUSBAND was Bob Topping, the tin-plate heir, who married Lana in 1948. This lasted four years.

FOURTH HUSBAND, movie Tarzan Lex Barker, and Lana married in Italy in 1953. They were divorced last July.

CHERYL'S TROUBLES came to light last year when she ran away to keep from going back to her private school. Here she is picked up in Los Angeles police station by her mother and Stephen Crane.

ARM-LINKED THREESOME was formed at the Los Angeles airport last month when Cheryl greeted Lana and Johnny on their return from Paris and Acapulco. Cheryl spent last Christmas with Stompanato and her mother in England, where Lana was making a movie. Lana says that in recent weeks she has been trying to break off with Stompanato, fearing that in their violent quarrels he might harm her.

STRICKEN MOTHER arrives at the Beverly Hills police station shortly after the killing. Lana told police, "I didn't know what was happening. I thought she was just poking Johnny with her finger. . . ."

CHERYL AND FATHER clutch hands at police station where she was held for murder. Composed through the questioning, Cheryl said, "I wish I could cry like mother but I always hold things in." →

ON BEDROOM FLOOR of Lana's home, Stompanato's death wound is examined by a Los Angeles police officer. He was 32 years old, five years younger than Lana, and an ex-Marine. Stompanato apparently made no attempt to defend himself because he did not know Cheryl had a knife.

Sever Malnic

...in his lifetime,
a 4,600% increase

Sever Malnic owns a ranch in Azusa, California.

Sever and his son, Eric, also own 150 shares of stock in Union Oil.

This entitles them (along with over 67,000 other share owners in the company) to a report on our 67th year of business.

How we spent it

In 1957 our customers paid us a new record amount: $436,731,000.

We spent 73% of this—or $318,681,000—with over sixteen thousand other companies and individuals with whom we do business.

1,000 tax collectors

The more than 1,000 tax collecting agencies took another 3.6%, or $15,910,000. This does not include the $77,890,000 we collected from our customers as fuel taxes and turned over to governmental agencies.

Wages and other benefits for our workers and their families amounted to 14.6%, or $63,904,000 of our income.

This left 8.8%—or $38,236,000—as net profit. Slightly less than half of these earnings—or $18,516,000—were paid in cash dividends to the Malnics and our other 67,000 share owners.

The balance of our net earnings—equal to 4.5% of our customers' dollars*—we reinvested in the business to expand and modernize facilities.

A competitive economy

Doing business under America's system of free competitive enterprise, Union Oil has gone from $9 millions to over $400 millions in yearly income during the lifetime of Sever Malnic. That's a 4,600% increase.

Within the lifetime of his son? As long as our economy remains free and competitive, our future can and will surpass our past.

This does not include that part of the customers' dollars we collected for the government as fuel taxes.*

HERE'S PROOF OF PERFORMANCE:

2½ years of freezing and frying—but Firestones need air only twice yearly!

"I've crossed desert country on roads hot as frying pans," says Ralph A. Fletcher of Detroit. "I've driven through Michigan winters and Mexican summers for 44,000 miles on my Firestones' original treads—and they were still ready for more! For over two years I never changed a tire—and the times those tires needed air I can count on the fingers of one hand!" Reports like Mr. Fletcher's are constantly being added to Firestone's file of enthusiastic users. They're continuing examples of how Firestone's speedway research helps build more strength and endurance into your highway tires.

Torture test on burning 132° track proves Firestone

In the famous 500-mile race at Darlington, South Carolina, the winning car averaged more than 100 m.p.h. on regular-production Firestone tires. The track temperature was a tire-scorching 132°. Such tests-by-torture on the speedway enable Firestone to build safer, stronger and longer wearing tires for your use on the highway. Every Firestone tire is built to deliver superior performance under tougher conditions, by far, than any you will meet on the road. Extreme conditions like those at Darlington helped to develop and demonstrate the qualities of Firestone S/F Nylon Cord for tires.

tires safest for you!

Here is proof of performance of the strongest tire cord ever made. S/F (Safety-Fortified) Nylon Cord was developed by Firestone and is used exclusively in Firestone Nylon Cord Tires. Its 40% greater fiber stability makes Firestones best at beating heat and impact—it brings you extra safety and mileage. Prove it yourself by putting a set on your present car—or order your new car equipped with Firestone S/F Nylon Cord “500” tires.

A SULKING PLATYPUS, PADDY, AFTER ONE MONTH IN CAPTIVITY, KEEPS TO HIS BURROW, REFUSING TO LEAVE OR EAT. HIS DUCKBILL IS COVERED WITH GRASS

RARE BABY DUCKBILLS

An Australian traps platypuses for the Bronx Zoo

For 10 years New York's Bronx Zoo kept in pampered luxury a pair of duckbilled platypuses named Cecil and Penelope, the only platypuses in captivity outside their native Australia. But last summer tragedy overtook the pair: Penelope disappeared and lonely Cecil died. The zoo had prized its duckbills. Though a mammal, the platypus lays eggs and is a rare living link between reptiles and mammals. The Bronx Zoo moved immediately to replace its loss.

Since platypuses are secretive, nervous animals, this was not an easy thing to do. The best man able to capture and tame them was David Fleay of Queensland, who had spent 25 years studying and keeping platypuses. For two months he searched the river and captured three young animals. The babies, which he named Pamela, Paul and Paddy, thrived on a hand-fed diet and slowly became used to visits by the public—all but Paddy, that is, who would swim on his back to show his annoyance at being on view.

Last week the trio underwent a final conditioning test, a trial air flight. Pamela and Paul withstood the ordeal successfully. But Paddy sulked so much that Fleay worried that he would die in captivity, finally turned him free in a nearby creek. Shortly Pamela and Paul will be on their way to the U.S. to take up living in the Bronx.

ON TWO SIDES OF A WAR

'The Young Lions' tells a tale of friends and foe

The Young Lions cuts back and forth across the battle fronts of World War II. It follows the fortunes of three young men from 1938 when one (Marlon Brando) was a German ski instructor, another (Dean Martin) was an American singer on Broadway, and the third (Montgomery Clift) worked in a New York store. It ends on a German road in 1945 when all three, war-shattered and bitter, come face to face.

The result is not The Young Lions that Irwin Shaw, hot from the fighting, published as a novel in 1948. Shaw's brutal Nazi has become 20th Century-Fox's gentle German full of good intentions, and happy endings are provided for the two American friends. But for all that the movie achieves a surging exciting unity, a furious shout against war itself, that will undoubtedly rank it among the best of the year.

TWO AMERICANS, Whiteacre (Dean Martin) and Ackerman (Montgomery Clift), patrol German road.

A GERMAN RAIDING PARTY under Lieutenant Diestl (Marlon Brando, right) and his stern captain (Maximilian Schell, left) prepares to ambush a British truck convoy in the North African desert. With their troops they are waiting tensely for the rising sun to blind their foes before launching their attack.

Eleven Fine Actors Get Their Dream Roles

STARS CREATE FOR 'LIFE' SCENES THEY WOULD LIKE TO DO

Photographed for LIFE by ELIOT ELISOFFON

Actors, lunatics and children all have a special capacity for making believe they are somebody else. In gifted actors this capacity is raised to a high art which moves and delights audiences—and is also deeply satisfying to the actors themselves. But even the most successful Broadway performers sometimes dream of roles they never get a chance to act, usually because they are typed for the kind of parts that first won them their popularity. For years, for instance, musical comedy queen Gwen Verdon (see cover) has been dreaming of portraying Harlequin. Brilliant and youthful comedians like Judy Holliday and Peter Ustinov have an urge to take on elderly roles touched with pathos or tragedy.

With this in mind, Photographer Eliot Elisoffon asked 11 Broadway actors—veteran stars and important newcomers—to select a favorite role which they have never done on Broadway. The actors, shown below as their off-stage selves, talked over their scenes with a top team of Broadway designers, William and Jean Eckart, who devised the settings, costumes and lighting in keeping with the actors' wishes. Then, in LIFE's studio, they assumed their dream roles for the photographer. The following pages comprise a unique series of world premieres of fine performers in fine plays.

SHIRLEY BOOTH
in 'The Rivals'

Shirley Booth, who has made her biggest success in drab parts, would happily take on the boisterous role of Mrs. Malaprop in Richard Sheridan's famous old comedy. It would, says Miss Booth, give her a welcome chance to dress up, and have fun with the play's malapropisms—the mixed-up words in Mrs. Malaprop's flowery conversation.

In this scene the gaudy old lady, trimmed like a Christmas tree, eyes a courtly gentleman who has just walked into her lodgings. Not knowing how to use the word "pinnacle," she murmurs to herself, "He is the very pineapple of politeness."

Costumes and settings designed by WILLIAM and JEAN ECKART

in 'The Glass Menagerie'

To Judy Holliday the greatest performance she has ever seen was Laurette Taylor playing Amanda in Tennessee Williams' first hit. Miss Holliday wants to do the role but adds, "I'd have a nerve trying to do anything Miss Taylor did. If I ever played it, it would be for her." In this scene, trying to recapture her youth as a southern belle, Amanda wears an old faded ball gown, and bravely chatters, "This is the dress in which I led the cotillion. . . . See how I sashayed around the ballroom . . . I wore it on Sundays for my gentlemen callers."

Describing her old-age make-up, Judy Holliday says, "I did it by exaggerating all my lines and flaws. It terrified me to look in a mirror. I felt I was seeing myself 30 years from now."

SUSAN STRASBERG
in 'Caesar and Cleopatra'

Crouching by the paw of a moonlit Sphinx, the 16-year-old Cleopatra sees a strange man standing alone in the desert. He asks, "Why are you not at home and in bed?" She answers, "Because the Romans are coming to eat us all. You are not at home and in bed either." To her horror, the stranger reveals that he himself is the Roman general Julius Caesar, and with this scene G. B. Shaw's play springs swiftly to life.

Susan Strasberg, who at 19 is a leading Broadway actress, says she would like to act Cleopatra because "she keeps changing. At the start she is a wild child. At the end she is a worldly queen—closer to Shakespeare's Cleopatra. That's another Cleopatra I would like to play—someday when I'm older."

in 'Winterset'

An exciting newcomer to Broadway and films, young Anthony Perkins wants to get his teeth into the role of Mio in Maxwell Anderson's fine 1935 verse play about social injustice—"a wonderful mixture of realism and surrealism" Perkins calls it. Mio is a young outcast, bent on avenging his father who was executed for a crime he did not commit. He is shown at left and below in two tormented portraits, as he replies to a girl who asks him why he is bitter.

*I'm alone, that's why. You see those lights, along the river, cutting across the rain—?
those are the hearths of Brooklyn, and up this way the love-nests of Manhattan—they turn their points like knives against me—outcast of the world. . . .*

TYRONE POWER

in 'HIM'

"I found it provocative and fascinating. It's a surrealist play of ideas," says Tyrone Power of this offbeat role in HIM, by a leading American poet, e. e. cummings. Power, whose movie popularity obscures the fact that he is a high-caliber stage star at home in Shakespeare and Shaw, thinks the play would have little chance in a commercial production, but he would like to take a crack at it.

The hero is given to addressing himself in a mirror. When his girl questions him about his image of himself, he answers, "... there is a further image—which appears . . . in a still deeper mirror. The planes overlap . . . and sometimes the straight lines seem to fall. Philosophy is a dream pistol which goes off—bang—into flowers-and-candy . . . we dissolve, you and I. Stop look and listen to a fraction of myself."

RODDY McDOWALL

in 'The Tempest'

*All hail, great master! grave sir, hail! I come
To answer thy best pleasure; be't to fly,
To swim, to dive into the fire, to ride
On the curl'd clouds. . . .*

Shakespeare's lines are spoken here by Ariel, the sprite who serves the magician Prospero, on his sea-girt island. To play Ariel, Roddy McDowall created his own fantastic make-up to look as if he were spattered with ocean spray and could really ride the "curl'd clouds."

One of Broadway's most versatile young performers, McDowall finds this complex role a challenge because Ariel is "full of fun and zest, and he is also vengeful. He embodies two conflicting desires: to be free of bondage to his master, and to love his master." McDowall has played Ariel in a summer production, but "I still feel I haven't used up the part."

in commedia dell'arte

Gwen Verdon, who shines as a musical comedy star, feels deeply indebted to Harlequin, a classic character in the 16th Century commedia dell'arte. In this free and easy form of Italian theater, strolling players used to improvise their own dialogue as they acted out popular plots. Their comic tricks have been handed down through the years and are still used by circus clowns and burlesque comedians.

"Harlequin is a well-rounded, sensitive person," says Gwen. "His love for Columbine—especially when she breaks his heart—makes a man of him. He's transformed by suffering. The swirl of blue paper in his eye represents tears. The flower on his nose is a symbol of unattainable beauty—like Columbine. He hunts for it everywhere, not realizing that it is right in front of him. Whenever I get a new part I always stop and ask myself how Harlequin would do it. It's helped me a lot."

PETER USTINOV
in 'King Lear'

*Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!
You cataracts and hurricanoes, spout. . . .*

Stripped of all his royal glory, and with the wind whipping his gray hair, Shakespeare's King Lear shouts these words as he wanders homelessly on the heath. The passage is usually taken to mean that King Lear has gone mad. But Peter Ustinov, the brilliant young actor-playwright, has a different interpretation. "Lear is mad only at the beginning of the play," says Ustinov, "and becomes sane at the end. The heath scene in the play is actually a turning point in the old king's madness like the crisis in a fever. The temperature reaches its peak, after which the patient begins to get well."

JULIE HARRIS

in 'He Who Gets Slapped'

"I've always loved plays about circus people, and I think this is the most beautiful circus story there is," says Julie Harris who picked the role of the bareback rider Consuelo in Leonid Andreyev's Russian drama. "The girl stands for all the innocence in the world," says Miss Harris, "and yet underneath her innocence there is a corruptible quality that leaves you in doubt about how she will turn out. The first time I saw the play—that was years ago—I was so moved I wished I could do it right then."

Consuelo is loved hopelessly by a world-weary aristocrat who joins the circus as a clown and is called He. In her last scene, pictured here, Consuelo holds a glass of poisoned champagne given to her by the clown to save her from a tragic marriage. As the poison takes effect painlessly, Consuelo whispers, "I am flying. I am the sea-foam."

JASON ROBARDS JR.

in 'Idiot's Delight'

Jason Robards Jr., who recently shot to fame in two heavy Eugene O'Neill dramas, wants to play a hooper—Harry Van Sherwood's colorful anti-war play which won a 1936 Pulitzer prize.

Harry heads a little traveling troupe of show girls. Stranded in an Italian hotel at the outbreak of a war, he proves to be a better specimen of mankind than many of the distinguished guests. In this scene he and the girls carry on as the guns start booming in Europe. Robards likes the role, he says, "because the real Harry behind the tough-talking showman is a guy who cares a lot about what happens to the world and the people in it."

BERT LAHR

in 'Henry IV, Part II'

"I don't know much about Shakespeare," says Bert Lahr, who has been a star buffoon for years, "but I feel I could do right by Falstaff. The trouble is they usually make him a lecherous character so that when you get to that final scene where the king tells him off he looks like he deserves it. It could be very touching."

Kneeling here at the climax of Shakespeare's drama, Lahr is a heartbroken Falstaff. He watches the royal robe of his beloved crony, who used to be Prince of Wales, sweep past him. Now crowned King Henry V, the new monarch snubs Falstaff:

*"I know thee not, old man: fall to thy prayers;
How ill white hairs become a fool and jester!"*

MONSANTO PRESENTS: CREATIVE CHEMISTRY IN THE CONQUEST OF

Famed CBS News journalist Eric Sevareid, narrator for MONSANTO's television series, "CONQUEST," tells how science is helping man understand, withstand—and even control—some great forces that make up weather.

"Weather made to order, long a dream of man, is a little closer now.

"Scientists can sometimes make rain by sprinkling or 'seeding' clouds with chemicals. Having already learned how to reduce hail, they are now studying ways to reduce rainfall—also by 'seeding.'

"While science is gaining a bit of control over the weather, it is also winning a look into its future behavior. Today, electronic brains forecast changes in air pressure with 90% accuracy. Weather reporting stations in the Antarctic are filling in the last blind spot on the world's weather maps—a big step forward in the progress of long-range weather forecasting.

“Rockets, high-altitude balloons, earth satellites are giving mankind new facts about the sun's influence on weather.

“New, powerful radar units now watch storms from hundreds of miles away.”

Monsanto contributions to the conquest of weather range from basic chemicals for shelter materials to electronic coolants for storm-tracking radar. Some important examples of how Monsanto chemicals help resist the effects of weather are shown at right.

BEFORE PIERS WERE TORN DOWN AND REBUILT, THE STONES WERE NUMBERED TO BE PUT BACK IN PROPER PLACE

Rebuilt by the Numbers

For years after the Germans blew it up in 1944, sentimental Italians argued over whether and how to restore their beloved bridge of Santa Trinita over the Arno at Florence. Some wanted to re-create the 400-year-old span. Others thought it hopeless. At last, six years ago, Architect Riccardo Gizdulich got the job. First, he dammed the river and searched its bed for fragments. Then he cross-indexed all remaining stones. He re-created ancient tools and taught modern workmen to use them in shaping new stones from the original quarry. Last month his work was finished and so well done that, seeing the reopened bridge, one delighted Florentine said, "I don't see why you can't make love to the same woman twice."

RESTORED BRIDGE duplicated "mysterious" curve of the arches whose design followed no known rules of engineering. Gizdulich took all the necessary new stone from quarry in Florence where original stone came from.

SACK SHOWS UP ALL OVER

Debate still rages but the chemise sells out

The chemise—or sack, or bag—has now been around for months but arguments over it, instead of calming down, keep flaring up. In Birmingham last week chemises were publicly put to the torch. In editorial pages and over television, men continue to make furious attacks on the style. But it is a smash success with the women and merchants, if not all the men, of the country. Stores report that the chemise accounts for 80% of all moderately priced dress sales, that without it they would have been badly hit this season. Women were recently advised by a financial columnist to combat the recession by buying the chemise. The sellout is based less on patriotism than on that old springtime urge for something new. But whatever the reason, the chemise is showing up all over the U.S., as these pictures show.

Like the American Airlines girls in Chicago (left), most women have bought the chemise in its sackiest shape and wear it several inches too long. In the latest Paris collections many more flattering variations are available. And, worn properly, the chemise can garner compliments from unexpected sources (p. 102).

BIRMINGHAM Girls burn sacks at a public bonfire sponsored by a disk jockey. For each dress donated, girls got a free album of records.

← BAGGED CHICAGO GIRLS LINE UP AT CAFETERIA

LEXINGTON, KY. Ladies visiting Calumet Farms all wear the same chemise. They first saw it on Mrs. John Perkins (fifth from left) at a recent club meeting. Next day 24 members ordered same dress, most in dark colors.

ST. LOUIS, MO. Coeds in the sack collect outside dormitory on Washington University campus. Of 1,500 female students, half own at least one chemise, wear them to classes despite male catcalls, like them for comfort.

DEFENDER OF CHEMISE

TRAPEZE BACK chemise is approved by Rocky Graziano, ex-boxer, who defended the style on TV. Of its male detractors, Rocky says, "I've been around as much as they, and I like the modern kick." This version costs $90.

BELTED FRONT chemise, a relatively conservative variation of the style, gets the nod from Rocky. He admits that "the chemise is not for fat dames and it looks best on a size 8." This one is a $70 beige silk street dress.

FLOUNCED SKIRT style is a "show stopper," says Rocky. Like all of the Luis Estevez dresses on this page, it is worn short, just below knees. Rocky finds this perky skirted chemise "the exact opposite of the sad sack."

Skeezix was the hero of the strips which told in thrilling detail of his derring-do among Shanghai bandits. Kept happy in bed by this good medicine, Skeezix slowly recovered. Now at 16—he will be 17 this month—he is a healthy high school junior who plays football, basketball and trombone for his school. Last week he was keeping fit by lifting weights in his garage. Stratton, who still corresponds with Skeezix, has become vice president of a New York publishing firm. Only the get-well cartoons have not prospered: they were badly singed when the Bonzi home burned in 1950.

END ON A BLUE NOTE

Jazzman W.C. Handy is given a musical funeral

With his own world-famous melody as a requiem and a toy trumpet placed sentimentally on his coffin, "the Father of the Blues" was buried last week in New York City. William Christopher Handy, composer of the St. Louis Blues, was dead at 84. His service was crowded with musicians. They, and others like them, had taken the blue note he introduced some 50 years ago and turned it into the most haunting, distinctive strain in American music.

Handy wrote his first hit, Memphis Blues, in 1909 as a political campaign song. But most of his melancholy rhythms were inspired by the sights of trouble and sounds of sadness he saw and heard as a trumpeter with a minstrel show band. His Beale Street Blues immortalizes an infamous Memphis street. Aunt Hagar's Blues was based on a washwoman's lament. Handy saw a lonely guitarist picking out a tune with a knife blade and wrote Yellow Dog Blues. The words to St. Louis Blues ("I hate to see that evenin' sun go down . . .") were inspired by a drunken woman as well as his own suffering on a trip to St. Louis. Handy's eyesight began to fail in the '20s and in his last years he was totally blind. Now, as his eulogist said in the church, "His personal blues are finished."

W. C. HANDY

FUNERAL MARCH is led by the slow-stepping Prince Hall Masonic Temple band in a Harlem street. Most of the band members are former jazz musicians.

TRYOUTS FOR GOOD IDEAS

The nation stirs with new interest in science, new plans for schools

In the midst of the crisis in education which LIFE has discussed in the first three instalments of this series, the rapt faces of teen-agers above are an encouraging omen. Even as the weaknesses in the schools are being revealed and debated, some good ideas are being tried out just where they are most needed—in the vital fields of science and math.

In the new atmosphere of urgency, scientifically minded youngsters all over the U.S., in school and out, have suddenly become the objects of fond and anxious national attention. They are offered awards and scholarships, admitted to the sanctum of serious scientific research and even honored with parades. More important, the youngsters themselves are responding enthusiastically. School science clubs are burgeoning and this year some 300,000 youngsters, 50,000 more than last year, are displaying their personal scientific projects at local and regional science fairs.

All these signs, however hopeful, would mean little unless they were at the same time reflected in the classrooms. And this is beginning to happen. In schools all over the country, science and math courses are being reassessed and tightened up. A wholly new way of teaching math and physics is being worked out and used (pp. 122-125). Thousands of students are getting advanced subjects, expertly taught via TV in small rural high schools which hitherto were unable to offer them. Finally, to raise the quality of the schools in general, a famous educator announces his far-reaching plan for an entire model high school (pp. 120-121).

ST. LOUIS. In St. Charles, suburb of St. Louis, 2,300 pupils from 11 schools show homemade exhibits in science fair, held this year for the first time in this district. St. Charles Rotary Club, the sponsor, gave $91 in cash prizes, plus a $50 scholarship for top winner. Prize ribbons were won by 359 exhibits.

Famous educator's plan for a school that will

The animated chart below gives the essence of a significant and workable answer to the basic problem of U.S. education: how to raise its intellectual quality—giving the best minds a chance for unhampered intellectual growth—and yet still preserve its traditional democratic ideals. The plan was worked out by one of America's most distinguished educators, James Bryant Conant, Harvard's former president, who has for years concerned himself with high school problems. This spring, after having made a firsthand survey of 50 high schools in 16 states under the sponsorship of the Carnegie Corporation, Dr. Conant set down his concept of an ideal high school. He then collaborated with LIFE in preparing this simplified chart, which is the first published statement of his over-all idea.

In a school set up according to the Conant plan, there would be three general levels of courses: a stiff academic curriculum for the upper college-bound 20%, an elementary level for the bottom 20% and a diversified vocational program for the rest. But students can move from one level to another to take certain courses. A vocational student, for instance, may take some academic subjects if he shows ability. Every student must take four years of English, four of social studies, two of math and two of science. But they are separated into different classes according to ability. Bright students should also take at least three years of a HIGH SCHOOL PLAN shows careers of representative bright, average and slow pupils through four grades of comprehensive high school, as envisioned by Dr. Conant. Each student's curriculum is traced by yellow line to show how it crosses from level to level for some courses. Pupils begin the day together in homerooms, then separate for individually planned courses. Bright pupil takes stiff precollege academic course which requires 20 hours of homework a week. By 12th grade he does original English research, reads French newspapers and takes college level science and math. He goes to other level advance students according to ability foreign language. All pupils mix daily in homerooms, physical education periods (not shown in the chart) and certain classroom periods. Dr. Conant emphasizes that the success of the plan depends on the school's guidance counselors, who must help every boy and girl choose the right subjects and pressure bright students to take tough courses. As a result each pupil will have a hand-tailored school career and a definite idea about what he intends to do after graduation.

Dr. Conant's plan is a series of recommendations and not a detailed blueprint. One of its great merits is that all its elements are being practiced in part in one school or another. Dr. Conant chose only those he has seen working successfully in schools he visited.

The school best suited to the plan is the comprehensive high school. Comprehensive high schools are large and offer a wide range of academic and vocational subjects to their students, who themselves represent a cross section of the population in ability and background. There are about 2,000 comprehensive high schools in the U.S. which fit Dr. Conant's definition. There will be many times more as soon as thousands of small, inadequate rural high schools consolidate into larger units—a policy he strongly recommends.

CONANT

for subjects like mechanical drawing and typing. Average student takes a largely vocational course. This example shows one who is interested in building trades. He joins bright pupil in biology, modern and U.S. history. He takes woodshop, simplified general studies, and vocational math and spends part of last two years outside school working on building projects. Slow learner takes even more simplified general studies and basic shop courses. He spends part of last two years working in garage, which may hire him after graduation. All three come together for music, 12th grade social studies, and typing.

Wave mechanics with a toy

Long Slinky toy (above) introduces students to wave mechanics. In double exposure above a moving wave is shown twice, once (top) on its way out and again coming back on the rebound. The returning wave comes back on the opposite side of the Slinky. Reflected light and radio waves behave in the same way.

Sensitivity with a soda straw

Dr. Jerrold R. Zacharias (below), head of Physical Science Study Committee, weighs hair on a delicate microbalance consisting of soda straw, matchbook, balancing screw and a calibrated medical tongue depressor. Balance can measure one millionth of an ounce, equal to that of refined lab balances.

Do-it-yourself physics

At M.I.T. a group of eminent scientists collaborating with some high school science teachers have been fomenting a revolution in high school physics with toothpicks, rubber bands and pie plates. They use these homely tools to perform the experiments shown here that are part of the new course they are preparing.

The scientists say that two basic things are wrong with high school physics. Its concepts are decades out of date and its textbooks overloaded with practical applications. The new course, developed with National Science Foundation support, concentrates on basic principles, many of them new to high schools. To demonstrate the principles, the M.I.T. group has invented these amazingly sensitive devices, so inexpensive to make that lack of money will not keep a school from using the course. In its debut this year in eight secondary schools the course has proved so successful that 300 teachers will be trained to teach it this summer.

200,000 volts with a baking pan and rubber belt

A Van de Graaff generator used to build up high electric charges is made of a metal geography globe coated with aluminum paint, a plastic tube, baking

Cloud chamber reveals paths of nuclear particles. This chamber is plastic food dish, chilled over mouth of Thermos containing dry ice and alcohol. In dish is alcohol vapor and thumb tack tipped with radium scratched from watch dial. Under bright light tracks of particles from disintegrating radium show up clearly.

Ion migration with a light bulb

A pot of molten sodium nitrate, a carbon rod electrode and a 25-watt showcase light bulb are used to demonstrate that ions can migrate through matter. When the rod and the bulb are put in the pot, current flows between them. The filament then attracts sodium ions which migrate through glass and cloud bulb's interior.

of his class. Some have moving parts and can assume different shapes to demonstrate theorems. A few of them are being produced for sale to schools.

New patterns in mathematics

Like physics, mathematics is also headed for a face-lifting on a national scale. Already unfamiliar formulas (below) are blossoming on blackboards in selected schools across the U.S. Basically the new math teaching does away with old-fashioned rote learning and aims at getting students to think mathematically, a process fundamental to all science from astrophysics to zoology. It also breaks down the watertight compartments into which the old math was divided—arithmetic, algebra, geometry, trigonometry—and emphasizes the underlying ideas which are common to them all. In doing so, it brings in entirely new kinds of high school mathematics, which are needed for nuclear physics, the social sciences and industrial management.

BOOLEAN ALGEBRA, which underlies design of electronic computers, is part of the new 10th grade math program at Blue Island High near Chicago, Ill.

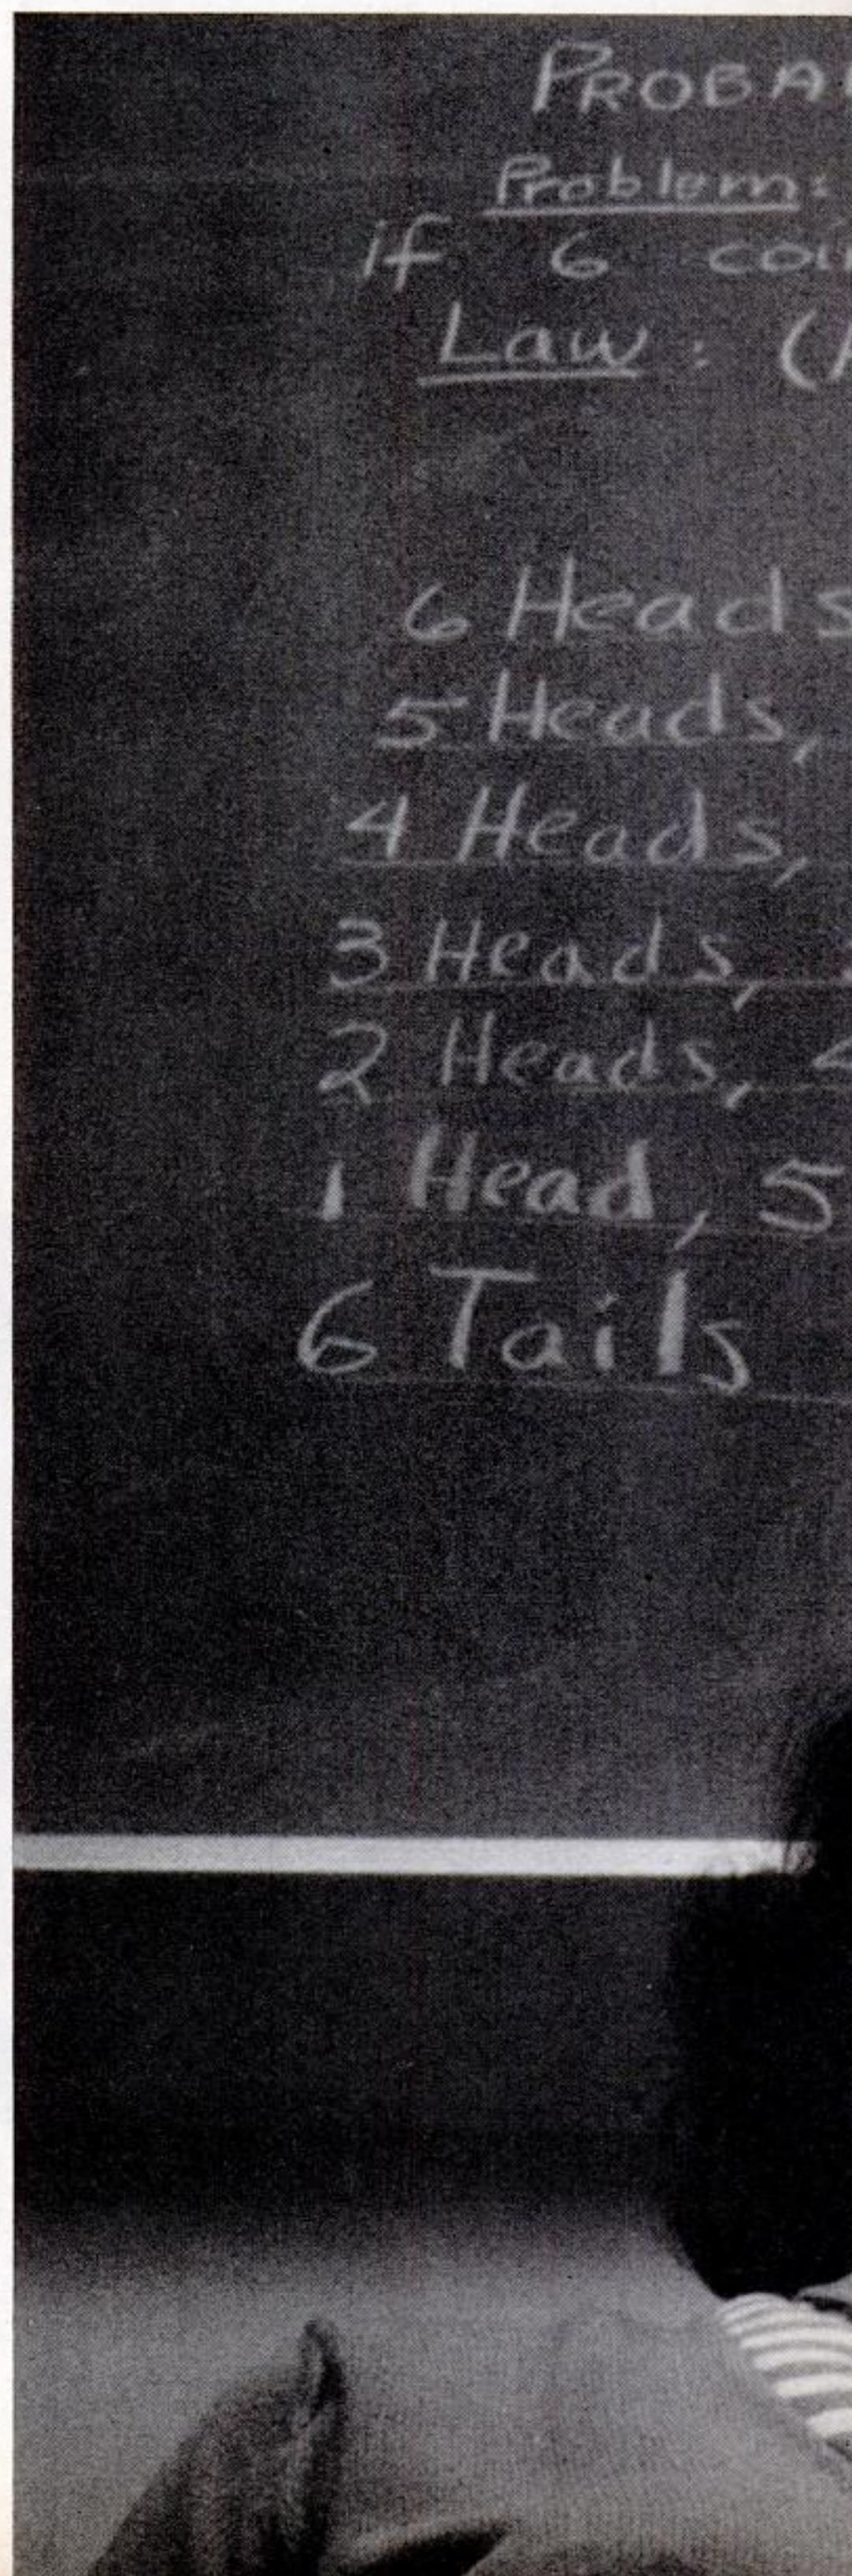

CALCULUS, normally a college subject, is given to 12th grade at Cincinnati's Walnut Hills High School. Students taking the course earn credit in college.

NEXT: THE FAMILY AND LEARNING

ARRAY OF ABACI designed by Ohio State's Dr. Nathan Lazar helps second graders in Columbus, Ohio learn arithmetic. Vertical rows of beads are used like traditional oriental abacus to count ones, tens and hundreds. The beads in horizontal rows count only ones and are used for preliminary calculations.

TOSSED COINS are used by seniors at West Hempstead High School, Long Island, to test the law of probability in a problem previously worked out on blackboard. Probability and statistics are taught in honors course which starts with an introduction to modern mathematical logic and the algebra of sets.

A Brooklyn boy tells

The young Negro who tells the story that starts below under the pseudonym of "Frenchie" is doubly remarkable. When only 13 he skillfully led to power one of the toughest street gangs in Brooklyn, N.Y. Then, after many arrests and a training school stretch, he completely changed his ways. Today, at 23, he is a graduate medical research worker. Ira Henry Freeman, a veteran New York reporter, has set down this story (illustrated by Robert Weaver) as Frenchie told it, using the language of the gangs which terrorize New York City now even more than they did in Frenchie's time.

I WAS not yet 14 years old when Gus Gibbons, president of the Little Bishops, picked me to be president of his new Fifth Division. The Bishops were then one of the largest street clubs in New York City. The five divisions had 150 or 200 members between 13 and 18. They claimed a turf extending for two miles along Fulton Street in Brooklyn and had brother clubs in Harlem and the Bronx.

I was an important sahib for so young a kid. But I was tall for my age, a little smarter than most of the other bops, or gang members, and had the prestige of having already been busted—arrested—twice by the cops.

My first arrest had been for gang fighting. The second was for firing a zip gun at some kids in John Marshall Junior High School. That is the same school that was in the papers recently because a 13-year-old girl was raped there. The principal committed suicide in despair. There were rapes and fights when I went there, too, but our principal did not kill himself. He just left.

A TEEN-AGE GANG LEADER'S BRUTAL TALE

how his street club shot its way to power

I had made the zip gun in shop class out of a toy airplane launcher. Afterward I made more of them for other bops in my division. Our zip guns could throw a .22-caliber cartridge 25 yards and were as good as any homemades in Brooklyn.

A few months later, however, I stumbled on a load that made them seem like cap pistols. In an empty lot on Sands Street I found a wooden crate containing two dozen brand new .38-caliber service revolvers and four marine signal flare guns. This was probably a shipment for the Brooklyn Navy Yard that had been hijacked off South Brooklyn piers and hidden temporarily.

I nearly broke my back lugging the crate to Lenny's candy store, where my club hung out. Lenny was a right guy who had been a bop in a street club as a kid and who still hated cops. He let us hide the guns in his cellar. We shook down little kids at school for their lunch money until we had collected $50. With that we bought some ammunition from a fence on the docks.

A threat to Gus Gibbons

THE sudden haul made a spectacular difference in our division's chances. With our new artillery we might rise to be top club in the city.

Overnight I was no longer afraid of Gus Gibbons, although he was 17, much bigger and much meaner than I. I had taken two of the flare pistols for myself and test-fired them on a roof with shotgun shells. When I let go with both of those cannons at once, I got ideas of becoming the Hitler of all the Little People [junior gang members].

Although Hitler and his Nazis had been wiped out years before, we still looked up to them as the meanest bops in history. Even today some bop gang leaders call themselves Hitler or Goering or Fuehrer, and I know one club—Negro at that—named the Gestapos.

My fellows were always bragging about their new guns. Bo would act out a favorite daydream. "Here a bull walkin' his beat. Here me layin' on the roof with my piece. I take aim. Bam! Scratch one headbeater!"

I told them not to sound off so much about the new pieces. But naturally the news leaked out. So I was not surprised when Calvin, Gus Gibbons' war councilor, arrived at Lenny's one night. A war councilor's main duty is to declare war on rival clubs. And Calvin would rather fight than eat or drink.

"It's on with the Robins," Calvin announced that night as he entered Lenny's.

Jumping off the counter stools, abandoning the pinball machine, jukebox and comics, the fellows crowded around.

"Man, when we goin' down?"

"Lemme get my piece!"

"Cool it a minute," I called above the hubbub. Then to Calvin I said, "What's shaking?"

Calvin said the Robins had stuck one of our Little People in the Second Division. But he couldn't give me any details.

"Gus says every division goin' down tomorrow night and hit 'em outside the Wynne Center," Calvin said. "Come packin' all you got. Gus says bring some pieces for him and the others too."

That was it. I figured that Gus, hearing rumors about new guns, wanted to see what we had. If

"The firing began while the Robins were still clustered on the stoop. The whole street was echoing with gunfire."

we had anything good, he wanted a share. At the same time, he might as well show off our guns so as to build up his rep as headman with the most firepower. The show would be spectacular enough since the Thomas Wynne Center of the Police Athletic League was only one block away from the 79th Precinct.

"Well, I don't know about that," I said. I was not eager for us to take all the risk just for Gus Gibbons' benefit.

But my fellows begged for trouble.

"It's on with the Robins," Calvin announced that night as he entered Lenny's. Jumping off stools, the fellows crowded around."

GANG WAR CONTINUED

"Aw, dig, Frenchie. Calvin says it's on. We can't punk out." I supposed it did not make much difference if Gus were giving us up about an attack by the Robins. Clashes have been turned on for less than that. Something was bound to give soon anyway. You could not leave two dozen .38s in a hole in the floor for long with kids like us around.

"Okay, it's on," I agreed, setting off a chorus of war whoops.

The following night, 43 bops showed up at Lenny's in uniform—black leather battle jackets, green army fatigue pants starched and pressed sharp, boots and black bleeckers with silver bands. The bleecker was a felt hat creased low in front that we bought from a shop in Bleecker Street for $5.

As we loaded up, you could feel the tension. None of us had yet fired a real gun with live ammo at anybody. Just to wrap our fingers around the grip of a businesslike, blue-black .38 gave us a charge down to our toes.

At 8:30 we took off. "Bishops goin' down!" the fellows sung out.

"Take it easy," Lenny called after us enviously.

We walked eastward on Fulton Street and on the parallel Atlantic Avenue, the main stems in our turf. It was a half-hour's hike to the Wynne Center at Gates Avenue near Marcy. But we were in no hurry, and it is traditional to walk down to a turn-on.

We cruised down the avenues in threes, keeping a half-block interval so as not to attract attention. We kept our jackets zipped up to cover the heats stuck into our waistbands, and we tried to look as though we were not going anywhere in particular. This was no time to get picked up.

The headbeaters would stop any group of five or more boys on suspicion of unlawful assembly. If they found a heat on us, they would take us in and beat our heads off. We hated those headbeaters worse than anybody in the world.

I was leading a column with Red, my vice president, and Chukker, the war councilor. Although it was a clear, cool night in February, I could feel sweat trickling down from my armpits. This was a big clash for a kid not yet 14 to lead.

Along the way we drank sneaky pete—as we called the strong, sweet, cheap wine—out of pint bottles, and we paused outside the candy stores to kid the babes in their car coats and kerchiefs. The Fifth Division did not yet have real debts or an organized girls' auxiliary. Of course, many of us had bams, as we called our steadies. These were schoolgirls, sometimes as young as 13, but we thought of them as women and made the old valentino when their parents were not home. Usually the bams would try to talk us out of a fight, although afterwards they never failed to boast of what we had done. If they had been real debts, on the other hand, they would have walked down with us, carrying the heats in case a bull padded the boys down. During the clash, the debts would wait at a candy store nearby.

As we passed the headquarters of the other four divisions in candy stores, quick-and-dirtys and cellar clubs, I thought it funny there was nobody there.

"It figures," Red said reassuringly. "They went down ahead."

"Maybe," I said, "unless they went to prayer meeting."

I was more leery than ever. Gus was planning on us being his expendables. We met him in a hallway just this side of Robin turf. With him were only Tattoo, his vice president; Calvin; and three or four officers of the other divisions.

Gus asked me, "How many guys you brung?"

"Forty-three," I said. "How many you brung? I didn't see any body on the way down."

"They be here," Gus said.

"Don't jive me up. We're the farthest division out. How come we the first to show?"

"If I tell you they be here, they be here," Gus said.

I was not ready to challenge him for the boss job just yet. I had seen him fight, and you could see in his eyes he hated the whole world. Besides, he still had a majority on his side.

"Your guys got their pieces?" Gus wanted to know.

"Sure, what you think?"

"You ought to give us some of them pieces," Gus said.

"Well, we gotta hold a council on that," I said.

Of course I was unwilling to give up a single piece. Gus squinted at me in his mean way, but he was in no position to dicker. My guys were piling up, and we had him five to one.

He decided to skip it for the moment. "Let's get goin' on the strategy."

Gates Avenue is lined with rundown, four-story brick tenements and a few stores. The Wynne Center is a fairly large recreation hall of dirty white stone with windows screened against breakage. A sign on the facade reads: "Helping Our Boys and Girls Become Good Men and Women."

I took a command post with my officers in a hallway opposite the center, where the Solid Rock Baptist Church is now. There are many storefront churches with crudely painted windows like that in our neighborhood, but they don't seem able to do much about bad kids. Gus and his staff hid in a basement nearby.

The rest of the boys were stationed in hallways, on cellar stairs and on roofs facing the center. I could see the red dots of their cigarettes glowing as we waited for the Robins to come out after their basketball game. We shivered in the cold, talking in whispers, fingering our guns.

At one point I slipped into Gus's hiding place to ask if his guys had arrived yet. "All set," he whispered. "Get back to your post." I had seen no sign of them, but it was too late to argue about it now.

Every time the door of the center was opened, we could hear yelling from the gym. It was 10 o'clock before the game ended, and a dozen Robins in their brown bleekers appeared in the lighted doorway.

I had given orders to hold fire until they came out a way, but some trigger-happy jerks couldn't wait.

"Here they come!"

"We shivered in the cold, talking in whispers, fingering our guns as we waited for the Robins to come out."

"Give it to them!"

"Burn! Burn! Burn!"

The firing began too soon while the Robins were still clustered on the stoop with the door open behind them. They fell over each other trying to scramble back into the center.

But Dick Forbes, their president, and one or two others chose to run. I ran out after Forbes. The whole street was echoing with gun-fire. Slugs were pinging against the sidewalk and steps near me. I heard a window crash and people hollering from their apartments.

I caught up with Forbes. He snatched an ashcan cover to shield himself, but it was chained short to a railing. Grabbing his collar with one hand, I held a flare gun to his head with the other.

He grabbed my wrist to get the gun away. Gus, Tattoo, Calvin, Red and Pete leaped to help me. We dragged Forbes into an areaway and beat him. He went down, screaming, with blood on his face. Then we stomped him with our boots. I had nothing against him personally, but the meaner you act, the bigger your rep.

Meanwhile three Robins had been shot on the stoop of the center. Two were helped inside by their friends. Bo and Youngblood jumped the other one left moaning on the cement. Bo rolled him for cash. But Youngblood, who was clothes-happy, began wrenching off the wounded boy's gray suede shoes.

A siren wailed. Cops in fleets of cars and on foot were pouring into the street.

"Headbeaters!"

We scattered. A prowler car screeched around the corner of Marcy Avenue on two wheels and blocked Red and me off. We ducked into a hallway and pounded up the stairs. As we tore up the dark stairwell we could hear footsteps drumming behind us. At a landing a tenant came out and cried, "Here!" spreading his arms. I chopped him aside with the flare gun.

Bursting out onto the roof, we could hear police whistles shrilling and people shouting in the street below. We sprinted over the rooftops, vaulting the parapets. Glancing back, I saw the silhouette of a head in a police cap against the skyline.

"Fire escape," Red gasped. We tiptoed down the iron ladders, taking care not to pant noisily as we passed lighted windows.

In the backyard we scrambled over a fence. We scurried through a cellar and finally crept out onto Monroe Street. Red had a reefer and we smoked it, puff for puff, as we zigzagged home through dark side streets.

Youngblood and eight others of the Fifth Division were busted by the cops that night, and we lost nine pieces. Youngblood was grabbed with his gun on him. The others were able to throw their pistols away before being nabbed, but we never recovered them.

Afterward Youngblood said Musclehead Ahearn worked him over in the station house that night and the next day. "Where'd you get that gun?" Whack! "Who else has 'em?" Whack! "Who was with

... as no other tires can!

- ONLY ARMSTRONG TIRES have Safety Discs between tread ribs (arrow).

- COMPARE ORDINARY TIRES, with no Safety Discs to keep the tread open.
- Braking pressure can squeeze tread ribs together, like the fingers above.
- Result: Gripping edges disappear ... tread becomes smooth, slippery ... and you skid! Only Armstrong Tires have Safety Discs to stop deadly skids.

you?" Whack! Youngblood never sang even though his nose was broken. Since he was over 16, Youngblood was arraigned in Adolescent Court on the felony of carrying a gun. He copped a plea and got off with a suspended sentence.

The others, being under 16, were sent to Youth House, where they played cards and shot the bull for a day or two before appearing in Children's Court. Only two were "adjudicated" juvenile delinquents and both were released on probation.

The judge said he was being lenient because of their good family situation. That was a laugh. Youngblood and I were the only boys in the club whose homes were not broken. Red's father lived in Harlem with another woman and Red had threatened to kill him if he set foot in the house. Chukker never knew who his father was and maybe his mother, who worked in a Chinese laundry, didn't either. Bo was one of five children by different fathers. He didn't see much of his mother, who worked nights in a hospital.

The real reason the judge released the boys was that all the state institutions for bad kids were bursting at the seams already.

The clash built up our rep. But it also grounded us. Prowl cars rolled through our turf once an hour, and the bulls checked Lenny's like night watchmen.

In desperation, the bops went to school to hide from the bulls. I bet some of them were meeting their teachers at John Marshall Junior, Westinghouse Vocational or Brooklyn High School of Automotive Trades for the first time. Since they had long been suspended, they had to bring their mothers with them to get back in. That naturally meant more trouble at home. Few of the guys had any use for school except for shop class, where they could work on zip guns, shivs [knives] and billies.

So much police protection kept our turf smooth for a while. This situation was intolerable and we blamed Gus Gibbons for it.

So when Calvin paid us another visit, saying, "It's on again with the Robins," we didn't cheer this time.

"Says who?" Chukker demanded.

"Says me and says Gus, is who. Gus says go down and hit 'em tomorrow night in the Sweet Shop. And, Frenchie, this time don't forget those pieces you promised us."

"Now hold time," I said. "You tell Gus go find some other jive cats. Only the Fifth Division showed last time and only Fifth Division guys got busted. It's us, not you, the headbeaters are running. From now on this club goes down when I say go down."

My guys thumped my back. "Tell him, Frenchie."

Calvin shrugged. "Gus won't be happy," he said threateningly as he left.

Gus didn't keep us waiting long. The next night Joker showed up at Lenny's with a leg so swollen and painful he could hardly hobble. Rat, who was with him, had his face bandaged.

"Man, what happened?"

It hurt Rat to talk. He sat there, spitting blood and nodding, while Joker told us about it. Rat and Joker had been pitching nickels in the yard of Westinghouse Vocational High School during lunch hour when Gus and a strongarm squad slipped through the crowd of kids and jumped them. Two guys twisted Rat's arms behind his back while Gus pressed an icepick against Rat's face.

"Gus say, 'What would happen if my hand slip?' You know how Gus talk, quiet, with that mean smile. Rat say, 'Why should it slip?' Man, he look scared. Gus say, 'Cause you a rat, is all. All you guys in the Fifth is rats. You ratted on us.'

"Rat say, 'No we didn't. Lemme alone.' Gus say, 'I leave you lone when you deliver couple of them good pieces.'

"I say, 'You leave us be.' But four, five guys hanging on me, too. Rat try to squiggle loose, but you know how small he is.

"Then Gus push the icepick clean through Rat's cheek. Man, Rat scream! That just bug me. I chuck off guys holdin' me and boot Gus. Tattoo whammed my leg with a softball bat. I don't know why it ain't broke. It go crack, like a piece wood."

My guys were furious. "Let's go down and burn them." Bops are always ready to blow their tops.

But I kept in mind that Gus's gang outnumbered us four to one. It was true that we still had fifteen .38s and four flare pistols besides our good homemades. But would our extra firepower make up for lack of manpower?

"We got to have a council of war on that," I said. Because it was early in the evening and the headbeaters had been running us so hard, only nine of us were present. However, they included all the officers and lieutenants, enough for a conference.

We trooped into the Ritz Bar and pushed two tables together in the rear. Over the bar was the usual sign: "If you are under 18, don't go away mad, just go away." Little Man was the only one of us over 18. He bought four pints of Manischewitz extra sweet for 40 cents each at the bar and brought them to us.

Pete and Moose got some hawg-maws from Sadie, the cookie. Rat slumped on the table, stoned. I could see he had snorted some horse [heroin] because his pupils were dilated. Rat was the first of our gang to become a junkie. He later died of an overdose of heroin at 21.

Gus summons Frenchie

WHILE we sat drinking pete and discussing what to do, a stone crashed against the saloon door. "Frenchie in there?" we heard a voice outside calling. "Tell Frenchie that Gus wants him outside."

The guys turned to me. I just tried not to look scared. "Okay fellows, let's go." I took a deep breath, settled my bleecker and walked out, looking a lot braver than I felt. All our pieces were in Lenny's a block away. All we had to cover our nakedness was our shivs and the four empty pete bottles.

Gus was standing alone across the street. But I had no doubt that he had a big gang lurking behind cars parked at the curb and in the hallways.

"Monkey-chaser, you got more to say than the president lately," Gus called. "We gonna settle this here and now."

"Give me a fair one," I said. Not that I was confident of licking him in a fair hand-to-hand fight any more than in a dirty one. But it was the only way to save my eight guys from a massacre.

"Fair one, nuts," Gus sneered.

But all my fellows and even some of Gus's guys, coming out of hiding, joined in urging it.

Gus grumbled but, seeing the general mood, he said, "Okay."

A ring of boys formed around us as we squared off in the street. But Gus and I had hardly exchanged a punch before Tattoo, Gus's vice president, and Chukker set off a riot.

"Drag outa here with that stick!" Tattoo shoved Chukker, who had grabbed a broom handle when we left the Ritz Bar.

"You gotta lean on me to make a point?" And Chukker whacked at Tattoo.

Suddenly Gus's guys jumped us from everywhere, swinging bats, chucking rock and bottles. Some winos who had emerged from the Ritz to watch the "fair one" moved out to break up the battle. They heaved ashcans into knots of struggling kids and slapped every one they could catch, friend or foe. By the time the police arrived, it was all over.

In the rout one of Gus's Little People was caught alone by Red and Moose. He was only about 13 and scared white. It was Joker's idea to take his trousers off and send him to Gus with a message.

"Tell him it's on with us," I said to the kid. "If he comes down here one more time, we're going to blow his tail off."

Chukker kicked the kid and he ran away in his undershorts.

We wasted no time in preparing our defense against the invasion we figured Gus was planning. At 6 o'clock every night the whole division mustered with pieces loaded. Our sentries lay out in Fulton Street and Atlantic Avenue to signal when Gus's columns appeared.

The rest of us hung around Lenny's and waited for the alarm to take our stations.

"If my windows get busted," Lenny warned me, "you gotta pay for it, no matter whose fault."

"Don't worry, Lenny," I reassured him.

"What makes you think I worry?" he said with a grin. I think he was delighted to see a big clash coming.

On the third night, clear and mild, the 8 o'clock relief of sentries had just gone out when we heard a whistle being passed down Fulton Street. We tumbled out of Lenny's like firemen. Little Man came up panting: "'Bout 40 Bishops cruisin' down Fulton."

Then Moose loped toward us, shouting that another column was advancing up Carlton Avenue.

"Everybody take your post and wait for the signal to burn."

Pete took half a dozen guys with .38s onto the roof of a hardware store on the northwest corner. Boston led a similar squad of gunmen to the top of a four-story tenement on the northeast corner.

Red, our best close-combat man, took a big assault party into an empty lot on the southeast corner. They smashed out the lights of an advertising billboard so they could crouch there in darkness behind piles of rubbish. They had previously collected mounds of rocks, empty bottles and half-bricks.

Chukker was in charge of a fourth party of in-fighters similarly armed inside Lenny's. Chukker himself had "borrowed" a .22 rifle from a friend's father.

As soon as the head of the enemy columns came into view, I walked out alone to the middle of the intersection. Waving both arms, I yelled, "Frenchie's here, have no fear!" I drew both flare pistols and crouched there, like Richard Widmark in a commando movie.

As they charged me from both directions, I heard them firing. But from the sound of the reports I knew their guns were just home-mades. I recognized Gus leading the bunch in Fulton Street. He fired at me without effect and then had to stop to reload. I let go with one flare gun. The range was long, but the birdshot must have peppered him because he howled and grabbed his ear. I fired the other gun toward Calvin's crowd approaching from the other direction. Then I ducked for cover, fast.

The snag was on. Our artillery opened up on the invaders under the street lights on the corner. We had the intersection under cross-fire from all four corners. "Burn! Burn!" And we poured it down.

The enemy broke. Red's team swarmed out of the lot, hurling bottles and bricks after them. Swinging bats, Chukker's squad rushed from Lenny's, and Chukker let go a round or two from the rifle.

During the hullabaloo, traffic continued in Fulton Street almost as if everything were normal. The windshield of one taxi was shattered accidentally. The outraged driver got out, but when he saw the melee he jumped back into the cab and took off.

We faded away as the police cars began to arrive, and we took care not to reassemble in Lenny's or the Ritz Bar that night. The head-beaters made a pass at searching Lenny's. They said they had a complaint he had pushed narcotics to boot us up for the clash.

"You don't search no place without a warrant," Lenny talked right up to bulls. "I never pushed junk to no kids or nobody else."

Shows you how much cops know. None of us, except Rat, began on junk until much later. We never even smoked a reefer before a clash because drugs slowed us down. Before a clash we drank pete to get high. It was only after a fight that we smoked reefers.

Meeting the next night on the corner, we decided unanimously to jump independent. We chose Deacons for a new name because the record Deacon's Hop was virtually our theme song. For years now church titles have been popular among Brooklyn street clubs—Bishops, Apostles, Chaplains and so on. I don't know why. We never paid church much mind.

I selected Red and Chukker, Moose and Pete to walk with me through Gus's turf and nail down our victory. We knocked off a pint of pete each, filled the chambers of our pieces with six shells and went down.

When we reached Gus's hangout at Marcy Avenue and MacDonough Street we lined up, ready for hell, with our right hands on our heaters in our side pockets. Some Big People [older gang members] loafing on the stoop stared at us.

"Where's Gus?" I said.

"What's shakin'?" one of them asked.

"Nothing shakin' but the leaves, and they ain't shakin' cause ain't no breeze. I want to see Gus."

They didn't know what we were up to, but by now they knew what we had in our pockets. We didn't explain but just stared them down until Gus appeared. I couldn't help smiling when I saw his ear wrapped up.

"We jumped independent," I told Gus. "We're the Deacons, and we're taking over the turf of the Fifth Division as of now. Stay out of Deacon Square until you're invited."

If they were going to jump us, this was the moment. We five stood there ready with our fingers on the triggers. The Bishops looked at us, then at Gus.

"We supposed to be brother clubs," he said to me. "You tried to kill me last night."

Relax, I said to myself, he's licked. Out loud I answered, "Was you turned it on, not us."

"Was only a sham," he said.

"Didn't look like it to me," I said. "But, anyway, as far as we're concerned, it's off."

"Call it cool if you want," Gus said sullenly.

We hung around a while, yakking friendly with the fellows and kidding their debts. Then we went home, horsing around all the way. We could have beat each other up out of sheer happiness. With only my 14th birthday coming up, I was already president of the club with the hardest rep in Brooklyn.

"Then we went home, horsing around all the way. We could have beat each other up out of sheer happiness."

SOCIAL BOSTON'S OWN FOLIES

DISCUSSING SHOW, MRS. JAMES HUNNEWELL BENDS OVER GRANDSON JIMMY TO MRS. LITHGOW DEVENS

The Vincent Club puts on a breezy musical benefit

In 1892 a group of young ladies of Trinity Church in Boston formed The Vincent Club and put on an amateur theatrical benefit for the newly founded Vincent Memorial Hospital. The club kept together over the years and is today Boston's most exclusive women's organization with members ranging in age from 18 to 92. Its annual shows have not only raised more than a million dollars for the hospital but have also given Boston society a chance to prove that it has talent and beauty enough to put on near-professional musicals.

This year the club permitted LIFE to make the first extensive photographic coverage of the affair. The two-hour show, with music and lyrics written by members, included, as it does every year, a precise military drill and had as its high point a high-kicking take-off on the Folies Bergères. It was such a lively production that one elderly matron asked another, "My dear, don't you think there are a lot of bare limbs showing this year?" "Oh no," said her friend reassuringly, "that's flesh-mesh."

Men who KNOW medicine say: "Take Aspirin!".... Doctors and public health officials are men who know medicine—men who know what's best for pain relief. And for headache, backache, muscular pains and fever from a cold, these men who know medicine say the thing to take is aspirin. And the best aspirin the world has ever known is Bayer Aspirin!

Why BAYER makes you feel better fast!.... Unlike pain relieving tablets which delay relief because they enter your stomach whole, a Bayer tablet disintegrates into soft, tiny flakes on its way to your stomach. Therefore, it's ready to go to work instantly—without delay—to bring the fastest, most gentle to the stomach relief you can get!

FEEL BETTER FAST—with BAYER®ASPIRIN

BOLSHEVIK BELOW THE BELT

It wasn't easy, when Photographer Israel Shenker was admitted to the Russian pavilion of the World's Fair in Brussels, to recognize the enormous truncated figure before him. Only the bottom half was showing. Sculptured especially for the fair, the 10-ton bronze statue was so big that it had to be shipped from the U.S.S.R. in three separate parts. Before the fair opens next week, the part shown here will be hoisted onto a brick pedestal, behind the statue. The upper torso will be welded to the waist. Then will come a bearded head to top the 26-foot-high statue of Vladimir Lenin who in life was 5 feet 7.

Why did all these whiskies (65 of them!) try to imitate Canadian Club?

In years past, unscrupulous distillers tried to capitalize on Canadian Club's towering reputation. The sixty-five bottles shown above are evidence of this. Yet, for 73 years, the distinctive flavor of Canadian Club has defied imitation. The only whisky that tastes like Canadian Club is Canadian Club itself. When you buy a bottle of Canadian Club today, you know you are about to enjoy the one great whisky that captures the lightness of scotch and the smooth satisfaction of bourbon. Canadian Club is made by Hiram Walker, now celebrating 100 years of distilling leadership. It's "The Best In The House" in 37 lands.
